Cutaneous leishmaniasis (CL) outbreaks have occurred with increasing frequency and rapidity in Ecuador during the last several years. A 3-year epidemic (1989-1991) involving a large number of patients occurred in the Matina area of Cuenca province, where at least 27 cases were reported each year. The region has been consistently urban and has seen a decreasing population density. Patients were mostly males between the ages of 30 and 70. Most cases were diagnosed as CL of the tegumentary type, and affected persons resided in 37 townships. The rate of sandfly biting was estimated to be 1 to 3 per person per night at 52 localities. Fifteen of 21 patients had lesions on the lower part of the leg, and 85% of affected persons had positive serology for antibodies to Leishmania species. All lesions in one patient were cured by systemic treatment with meglumine antimoniate (Glucantime)
